

The paper deals with the design of sampled-data controllers which preserve the stabilizing performance of a continuous-time backstepping control strategy. This is achieved through matching of the control Lyapunov functions evolutions at the sampling instants. The method is developed for systems in strict-feedback form. The results are discussed and compared with similar strategies through simulated examples.